Telephones Do Not Spread Disease.

The notion that disease is communicated by telephone mouthpieces was freely spread about some years ago by promoters of attachments offered as a remedy for his alleged danger.

The question of transmission of disease by telephone mouthpieces was, at that time, submitted to an eminent New York bacteriologist, who conducted tests upon mouthpieces of various types, and also took "cultures" from mouthpieces of public telephones used by hundreds of persons daily. At the same period similar tests were conducted by competent scientists in Boston, London, Buffalo and other centers.

These separate investigations yielded a common result. No disease germs could be detected. Danger was declared negligible. No case of transmission of disease has ever been traced to the telephone.

Only one precaution was recommended by investigators—that of cleanliness, such as keeping the mouthpieces free from dust, and washing them occasionally with soap and water.

ed at the time the germ scare started contained a fragrant fluid said to be destructive to germs. A bacteriologist placed some real germs on a telephone mouthpiece fitted with this attachment and left it twenty-four hours. When opened the germs were alive and well. He stated that this fluid had no germicidal properties, but merely gave a pleasant odor.

It was also shown that agitation by promoters of attachments rested on no scientific knowledge, but was purely a "scare" organized for selfish purposes.

Therefore, talk freely into the telephone mouthpiece, and close enough to give clearness. Rest assured that there is no likelihood of either contracting or spreading disease in this manner.—Suggestion Book, New York Telephone Company.
